Good morning, I.S 201! This is Nicole from class 851 here for Talk a Lot Tuesday on behalf of the S.E.A.L. Team.

Have you ever wondered how stories move from their authors' brains to the hands of readers all around the world? The answer is that book publishers make it possible. Your favorite book probably made it to your hands because of a publisher. It's only right that we have a special day to appreciate the works of publishers, and that is today, Book Publishers Day!

You might be wondering why Book Publishers Day is important. Book Publishers Day celebrates the significance of publishers and what they do. Without a book publisher, countless authors would be left without a way to share their stories for the world to read. Today's holiday highlights how much work it takes to publicize a book and make our favorite stories available to us.

Now that we've gone over all that, how can we celebrate Book Publishers Day? The best way to acknowledge this holiday is to learn more about what book publishers do. After school, do some research about the publication process and what happens behind the scenes after authors finish writing out their stories. Take this information and share with other people the value of publishers.

So, next time you pick up a book, think about the work that both authors and publishers have gone through to put that book in your hands and take time to appreciate them.

Thanks for listening have a Treat Books with Care Tuesday 😊
